

Sexual content online - scenario cards

I was at a friend's house the other day. He said he had some things on his computer he wanted me to see. His older cousin had shown him. It was a full-on pornographic website and it made me feel sick. He thought it was funny. I was too scared to say I didn't want to look at it. I'm going to his house to hangout next week and I'm worried he'll want to look at it again. What do I do?

Some of my friends have been mucking around and sending pictures to each other. The pictures are all about sex and show some really explicit stuff. This makes me feel weird and I don't feel right looking at it. I'm worried that if I tell them to stop, they'll think I'm really lame.

How can I talk about it with my friends? Do all young people want to look at this stuff?

Since I started secondary school, I have noticed lots of the boys in my class have been joking and laughing around about sex stuff they have seen online. It sounds like they have some sexist ideas about relationships. They think it's hilarious, and that they are really grown up for knowing about it.

It makes me really uncomfortable hearing the boys talk about this. I don't know how to tell them to stop.

Someone from another school I know has been sending me DM's. We've been chatting heaps. I feel like I'm getting to know them. The other day they asked if I would send them a nude. I want them to like me, because I think I like them. We've never actually met, but my friend's friend knows them. I trust them. They seem OK. Should I do it?

(This is about pretending to be an adult)

My oldest child is in year 7.

I have never talked to them about sex and relationships. We don't talk much about it at home.

I'm pretty sure they have seen some sex stuff on the internet because I check the search history sometimes.

I don't want them to think anything they see online is anything like an actual relationship.

How should I start talking about this with them?

When I was doing some homework the other day an ad popped up showing a woman with hardly any clothes on. I clicked on it and it took me to a pornography site. I looked at a few pictures and found it a bit interesting. I have looked at this site a couple times since. I'm pretty sure I would get in trouble if anyone found out.
